Like many other school leavers, Duong is coping with the issue of high life-plan anxiety. There are two conventionally available options for her to consider: entering the world of work or enrolling in the university system. She has finished high school this year and wants to get work immediately; however, it's difficult for her to go ahead with her plan due to her parents' objections. In Viet Nam's society, it's a common practice that people with low qualifications rarely earn others' respect and have fewer opportunities to get promotions in their career ladder. That's why her parents strongly expect that her distinguished academic result of the national entrance examination can help her win a place at a popular economic university despite her family's state of financial crisis. In contrast, she doesn't want to put more strain on her family with costly tuition fees and huge student loan debts during the four years of university. She has convinced her parents to let her find a stable job to support her family several times before, but they haven't agreed yet. Yesterday she had a consultation meeting with Mr Trung, her homeroom teacher. He advised her to give in her parents' demand by choosing a university with reasonable fees and scholarships offered to excellent students. Meanwhile, she can obtain a part-time job to relieve the cost burden, accumulate more experience and decorate her future CV. Now she is taking his advice into account and ready to persuade her parents to change their minds one more time.
