Read the text about how Gen Zs travel and match each paragraph (A-D) with the correct headings.

A. Gen Zs aren't easing into the travel market, they are exploding into it. Despite their youth and relatively low income, more than half of American Gen Z adults are frequent travelers, having taken three or more leisure trips in the past year, according to the data research company Morning Consult.

B. Gen Zs, those born between 1997 and 2012, are traveling as much as millennials, who are currently the focus of the travel industry, said Roeschke. However, unlike past generations, Gen Zs are not waiting until they have high-paying jobs or a large amount of money in their savings account to travel. Rather, "they are finding ways to fit it into their budgets" by spending less on non-essential products such as new clothes and technological devices.

C. The top three motivators for American Gen Z travelers mirror those of other generations: to relax, escape or get away, and spend time with friends and family. Moreover, the data shows they're motivated to travel for adventure, mental health, and cultural experiences more than older generations. More than any other age group, Gen Zs are also planning to travel longer, to take more trips abroad, and are the least interested in visiting places they've already been to.

D. While past generations may remember life without mobile phones and social media, Gen Zs turn to technology for travel inspiration and booking discounts. 62% of adult Gen Zs said they use technology to help them save money on travel, according to Booking.com's "Travel Predictions 2023." And they aren't just making decisions for their own trips, some are planning family vacations too.
