Braille language is a system of raised dots that is used by people who are blind or visually impaired to read and write. The system was developed by Louis Braille in the early 19th century and has since become a widely accepted method of communication for people with visual impairments.

Each Braille character is made up of a combination of six dots arranged in two columns. These dots can be felt with the fingertips, allowing the reader to distinguish between different letters, numbers, and punctuation marks.

Braille language is an important tool for people who are blind or visually impaired to access information and communicate with others. It is used in a variety of settings, including schools, libraries, and workplaces, and is recognized as an official language in many countries.

Despite its importance, access to Braille language and resources can be limited for many people who are blind or visually impaired, particularly in developing countries.
